

Wolfie Finale

There was no winner for Week 8 of the “Where’s Wolfie’ contest. For those of you who might have read the article, but chose not to submit an answer, I was sitting near the Selfie Skills display between the Sawmill Exhibit and the Logging Museum. This is a popular spot for those of you learning how to use your cell phone. At present, I don’t have a cell phone, but I have asked Johnny’s mom and dad if I could get one for Christmas - I’m keeping my fingers crossed, but I’m not too optimistic. Heck, Johnny doesn’t even have one. Maybe we could share one. Then I could keep in touch with all of my new friends.

As I mentioned last week, this will be the end of the first series of Wolfie stories. But remember, I am not going away; I’m just taking a break. I am hoping to be part of another series when, and if, the Maple Program begins in February. I am looking forward to learning about maple trees and maple syrup. If your school group comes to the MacKenzie Center, I will say hello.

But wait. Some of the Friends of MacKenzie volunteers have asked me to help them even sooner than next February. They want me to help to tell you about a MacKenzie Center calendar for the year 2021. (I’m not even a year old so I have trouble imagining what a calendar for a whole year looks like – it’s like a lifetime calendar for me.) All of the pictures on the calendar were taken at the MacKenzie Center. The proceeds from the sale of the calendars will be used for the Wildlife Project and will help build new enclosures for some of the animals in the Wildlife Exhibit - including my cousins, the wolves. A new interpretive trail will also be designed and constructed. Some of the new signs are already in place.

So, keep an eye on our website and on our Facebook page to learn about the fundraiser. And if you are looking for a good Christmas stocking stuffer, consider a purchase - the animals and the volunteers will appreciate it.

For now, thank you again to all of you who have read my articles and for those who have submitted responses. I had a good time writing them and sharing them with you. Please stay safe in the upcoming weeks. I’ll see you on the internet.
