I think that the most stressful thing about being a caregiver is frustration. I am used to identifying problems and solving them.

Suddenly, I'm faced with a range of confusing conditions I can't understand – let alone fix.

A.S. - from a note about her mother.

Caregiving can be deeply satisfying—whether you are caring for a parent, a spouse, a friend or a child. But, for many people, it is one of the most difficult challenges of their lives.

When caregivers become stressed or exhausted, it affects their loved ones. Thus, it is very important for caregivers to take care of themselves, while helping others.

The “Living Well” poem (explained on the back of this sheet) can help seniors, adults and teens. Use it to first help yourself. You'll have more energy and better health. Plus, these strategies can help you avoid the “stress blindness” that keeps you from seeing what's good about yourself, others and your life.

Peace of Mind?

What if helping you and your loved one to find peace of mind, forgiveness, happiness or love was a primary goal of caregiving?

Would anything be lost? And what might be gained by addressing each piece of the Wellness Puzzle?

Might love (e.g., a sense of oneness with others) really be an important medicine? ...along with whatever is prescribed by your care team?
