

Dan Lahut: I used all the over-the-counter pain relief that was available, every one of them, and I just didn't find anything that was going to consistently and long-term relieve my pain.

My name is Dan Lahut. I am a retired public educator, and I've had a history of athletic participation in all kinds of different sports and activities, including motorsport competition, Alpine skiing, things that generally lend themselves to injuries now and again. I was constantly trying to relieve joint pain. Constantly up at night, just pain all through the night.

I decided stem cell therapy was the next step because nothing else was presented to me as a viable solution. I really had my mind set that this was my last chance. Went in, nurse practitioner was fabulous, and that is the preliminary step. Within two days, I all of a sudden turned my head one day and felt no pain all the way. It shocked me at first, and then I raised my shoulder, just asked myself, "Is this for real?"

To this day, two and a half months in, my neck is 80% better than it's been in 12 years. I am more agile than I've been in many, many years, and I'm grateful. And when the weather changes, I fully intend to restart my competitive motorcycling because I'm feeling wonderful.
