Mental Health Reform Needs A Push
Please voice your support for HR 2646
—From Carol Lamont, NAMI SMC member

I hope that you will take the time to voice your support for The Helping Families in Mental Health Crisis Act, HR 2646 that has been stalled in Committee for far too long. As soon as I heard about Representative Murphy’s bill I read it, sent in my support and pressed NAMI and others to endorse it too. We need more folks to help push the doors open to help our loved ones get the mental health treatment they so desperately need so they do not put themselves and others at risk. Our current careless mental healthcare system is broken and passage of HR 2646 is needed to improve the healthcare provided to those with severe mental illness. I can testify about the difference proper mental healthcare treatment makes for those with severe mental illness, and for their families.

For more info on The Helping Families in Mental Health Crisis Act check out: http://www.treatmentadvocacycenter.org/solution/hr-2646

It takes just a couple of minutes, so visit the link below to add your voice, and then send this on to others in your network to urge their support too.

Mental Health Reform Needs Your Help

The Helping Families in Mental Health Crisis Act, HR 2646, is sitting in the U.S. House Energy & Commerce Committee. Until the Committee “marks up,” or amends the bill, it won’t go to the floor of the House for a vote. We’ve come too close to let mental health reform legislation fail now.

You can help. Your U.S. Representative is a member of the House Energy & Commerce Committee. Let your Representative know that America wants mental health reform and you want them to do their part by marking up HR 2646, co-sponsoring it and getting it to a vote. Email, call and tweet your member of Congress. Your voice can make the difference.

Thank you for your advocacy!

Happy Birthday Terry!

On October 10th, our longtime friend and past NAMI- SMC Board President, Terry Walker, will celebrate her 90th birthday! Warmest congratulations on this auspicious day. We take this opportunity to publicly thank Terry for her part in expanding the initial Parents of Adult Schizophrenics into the organization that NAMI is today - helping family members and individuals with mental health conditions. Amongst her many activities, Terry served on the San Mateo County Mental Health Board and the Board of Directors of Mateo Lodge, Inc.; she was a long-time NAMI Support Group Facilitator at the South County Mental Health Clinic; and an active volunteer for the Mental Health Association’s Friendship Centers. 13 Things Men With Anxiety And Depression Want You To Know
By Lindsay Holmes Healthy Living Editor, The Huffington Post  Posted: 09/16/2015

It’s not a weakness.

Openly discussing mental illness can be a tough battle for anyone -- but for men, the cultural baggage of traditional masculinity may make it particularly challenging.

There's an obvious stigma when it comes to men and mental health. Research suggests many men find it difficult to disclose mental illness symptoms and a recent analysis found that men are more likely not to speak up if they're having thoughts of suicide. In a society where "being a man" is conflated with being tough, it's hard for men to come forward and reveal they have a mental health condition.

However, confidential conversation is better than no conversation when it comes to mental health. Recently, Ask Men anonymously surveyed male readers on what they wanted everyone to know about dealing with mental health issues. Check out some of their responses below, then share what you want people to understand about anxiety and depression in the comments.

1. It's a health issue.
"It's a medical problem."

2. It's important to open up about anxiety.
"It's OK to have those feelings and wanting to talk about it is natural and healthy."

3. Men with anxiety are seen as "weak" -- and that's a problem.
"We, men, don't share any problems that we face because we think it makes us vulnerable and weak. Some have been taught to show that we are tough since childhood."

4. Lifestyle changes can help.
"Get out of it as soon as possible. Change your habits ... go on a vacation, movies, blind dates. Make new friends. Be positive."

5. Insensitive comments can sometimes stand in the way of support.
"Pretending to sympathize and saying things like 'toughen up,' 'it'll get better,' 'grow up, you are acting so immature,' 'grow a pair' are all not as helpful as [people] like to think it is. Perhaps they should consider observing people a little more before commenting like that."

6. If you want to know more about what they're dealing with, ask thoughtful questions.
"[A]sk questions that are not judgmental in nature. Rather than asking 'how did you screw this up?' consider how could this have gone better ... no need to repeatedly bring up past failures."

7. Mental health issues can be all-consuming.
"It always hurts 24/7 when you are experiencing anxiety and depression."

8. Anxiety and depression don't discriminate.
"It's very real. It can happen to anyone, any age and any gender. There is no switch to turn it off. There is help you can give and receive."

9. The conditions can cause poor thoughts.
"It's a vicious cycle. When you're suffering from it, one bad thought, event or interaction can be enough to send you into destructive thinking patterns."

10. Treatment can make anxiety and depression manageable.
"These are natural human conditions, but it's better looking for professional help in case you can't control them."

11. Mental illness is not just "all in your head."
"[I]t's not something for weak people, you can't just 'cheer up!' and it's okay and normal to talk about."

12. It's important to identify -- and speak out -- about the symptoms.
"How you deal with it is what matters. Usually the ones who undergo stress but don't show it in public suffer the most. One should definitely see a [doctor if they] have trouble with sleep, lack in focus, increased/decreased appetite as these are the initial signs."

13. Anxiety and depression should never make you feel ashamed.
"Depression and anxiety put you in a position where you have no control and feel very open, helpless and vulnerable. As [men], we are constantly being told we have to be strong and in control when we can barely get out of bed in the morning and every decision takes all the focus and energy we have. It can add to the downward spiral. Learn to ask for help and have someone to lean on, it will make your journey out of that black place a little easier."

The survey was conducted on AskMen.com from August 20-29, 2015 and there were 73 total respondents. Each response was confidential.

This post is part of ShameOver: It's Time To Talk About Men's Mental Health, a HuffPost Healthy Living editorial initiative that aims reclaim what it means to "be strong" by addressing the stigma men face in disclosing and seeking support for mental health issues. Each week we'll share features and personal stories about men and their caregivers as it relates to suicide, mental illness and emotional well-being. If you have a story you'd like to share, email us at strongerTogether@huffingtonpost.com.

When Austen Heinz was a boy, his teachers called him “the professor.” He was intensely fascinated with books and science, and once he started a project, he focused on it in a way that set him apart from his classmates. Sometimes he had trouble fitting in.

He grew up to found a company that laser-printed DNA. His goal was to democratize creation, to someday let customers create their own, wholly new creatures. Heinz believed that one day, human beings would be designed on computers.

If that day comes, Heinz will not see it. On May 24, he took his own life. He was 31.

Heinz is one of the latest in a string of startup founder suicides. In 2011, there was Ilya Zhitomirskiy, a 22-year-old social network founder. In 2013, Aaron Swartz, a 26-year-old Internet activist and Reddit co-founder. Later that year and into the next came three suicides among founders connected to a Las Vegas startup project. This year, Heinz and Faigy Mayer, 30, a founder and app developer.

In the startup world, mental health is not discussed as often as funding rounds or hiring, though it too affects the life and livelihood of founders, their employees and their investors.

The scope of the problem is unclear — news coverage of high-profile suicides may distort the issue, making them seem more prevalent than they are. Or coverage may downplay the issue — because media ethics discourage reporting on most suicides, it may go unreported when founders of little-known companies succumb to such despair.

But psychologists who work with entrepreneurs say that many struggle with mental health problems. A recent study by Bay Area researchers backs up their convictions, finding that entrepreneurs reported higher rates of depression, substance abuse, bipolar disorder and ADHD than the general population. Whether conditions are brought on by the stress of the job, or are endemic to entrepreneurial personalities is less clear.

In that study, nearly half of the 242 entrepreneurs surveyed reported having one or more of those mental health conditions, compared with 32 percent of the control group. Some entrepreneurs who didn’t report any mental health conditions said family members had them, suggesting that the types of people who become entrepreneurs may be genetically predisposed.

Better entrepreneurs

Sometimes, traits that tend to go hand-in-hand with mental health conditions make for better entrepreneurs, said Dr. Michael Freeman, a clinical professor of psychiatry at UCSF, executive coach and an author of the study. As adults, they may be driven to start companies because of a particular spark of creativity or ingenuity, or because they don’t do well in traditional workplaces.

“They have personality traits that are useful in entrepreneurship but not all that common in the population,” Freeman said. “They tend to be more persistent, more creative, more open-minded, more able to take risks … they think more quickly, they recognize opportunities.”

There were signs that Heinz was different from other kids when he was growing up in North Carolina. In fifth grade, he demanded he be home-schooled for a year. He had laser-like focus on things that interested him. Just 16 months older than her brother, Adrienne Heinz, who is a clinical psychologist, noticed that her brother was more irritable and isolated during his high school years, when his depression worsened.

Heinz sought help from mental health professionals intermittently as an adult. Despite his struggles, he was extraordinarily driven, his sister says. Even when he was busy, he found the time to mentor other startup founders. He stayed up all night and took long baths to ruminate on science projects. In his early 20s, he took a break from his studies at Duke University to take a motorcycle trip across North America, meeting with academics to promote the sharing of intellectual property among scientists.

As brilliant as Heinz was, he could also be polarizing; intense in his convictions, Adrienne said — if he hadn’t left the guests of a dinner party speechless, he hadn’t done his job.

Great depth

In 2008, he moved to South Korea, where he began a doctoral program and built the laser printer he used to make DNA. Believing his ideas could go further in the business world, he left three years later, moving to the Bay Area to found Cambrian Genomics. Late last year, he raised $10 million in venture capital to fund his efforts.

The idea of printing DNA troubled some bioethicists, who did not share his vision of creation with little regulation.

But Heinz saw it as a way to pursue a better human understanding of science and furthermore, as a way to do good: Editing DNA, after all, can lead to better crops and more advanced medical treatments. Heinz had already landed major drug companies as customers, including Roche, GlaxoSmithKline and Thermo Fisher Scientific.

Beneath the intensity that most people saw, Adrienne saw Heinz as a loving person with great depth. That was something that came across, especially in the times the two of them connected without words: playing with Adrienne’s young son, hiking under the redwoods in Marin County or cracking open Dungeness crabs.

Research has also found high rates of depression in stockbrokers — people who are similarly in high-stress, high-stakes jobs. A study by Dr. Alden Cass, a psychologist and the author of “Bullish Thinking: The Advisor’s Guide to Surviving and Thriving on Wall Street,” found that nearly a quarter of retail stockbrokers met the criteria for major clinical depression.

Some big stock brokerage firms have acknowledged the issue, adding mental health services — elective screenings, counselors and coaches, Cass said.

“Startups don’t have that,” he said. Many founders have quit their corporate jobs and are without the support of a conventional workplace or an employer’s health and wellness programs. While the Affordable Care Act requires Americans to have insurance or pay a fee, the societal stigma attached to mental health means many with symptoms go untreated. And even for those who have insurance, therapy often carries out-of-pocket costs.

Single-minded focus

and a round-the-clock work ethic — seemingly designed for entrepreneurs with mental health conditions, said Jerry Colonna, former venture capitalist. Colonna, who became a professional coach after dealing with depression himself, has a popular podcast and is planning a boot camp next year to encourage investors to discuss mental health issues that founders of companies in their portfolios may face.

“What Silicon Valley expects of founders in their promise to investors is really similar to what a hypomanic would say,” said Jakub Kostecki, a 39-year-old Colorado startup founder who has been diagnosed with bipolar disorder II, an often-milder form of the condition involving depression and hypomania. “If you’re a 25-year-old sitting in a two-bedroom with four other friends, saying that you’re going to do $500 million in revenue in two years, that’s the craziness that hypomaniacs say.”

Kostecki’s symptoms tended more toward hypomania — sometimes characterized by elation, energy and confidence. They started in his late teens and followed him through the founding of his companies. But lately, he’s been able to manage it: With a combination of therapy and lifestyle changes, including exercise and a vegan diet, he said, he hasn’t had a hypomanic episode in years.

Sign of weakness

He feels lucky. In the startup community, there is little support, and a lot of fear that showing any sign of weakness will hurt morale or scare off investors.

“If you look at the great painters and the great writers and the great people of this world, a lot of them dealt with these issues. There is greatness in the madness,” he said.

In their study, Freeman and his colleagues suggest that business schools and programs for startups — such as accelerators and incubators — are well-positioned to offer mental health education and resources to early-stage founders. Freeman said he’d like to see more education about the strengths and vulnerabilities associated with mental health conditions, confidential self-assessments and referrals provided in such settings.

One Silicon Valley firm that does breach the topic is 500 Startups, a Bay Area accelerator that mentors early-stage startups. The accelerator hosts a fireside chat called “Founder Real Talk,” where partner Sean Percival says he shares details about dealing with his own depression. Sam Altman, president of tech accelerator Y Combinator, has also blogged about how founders should not feel alone or ashamed if they’re depressed. Still, most of the discussions about mental health in the startup community are led by people such as Percival and venture capitalist Brad Feld, who have dealt with it firsthand.

“I always felt that founders assume everyone is watching them, waiting for them to succeed or fail,” Percival said in an email. “For first time founders so much of the process is new and there are no good resources for dealing with the dark times.”

Reducing stigma

Expanding the discussion could have broader benefits, Freeman said. Because entrepreneurs are well-respected for their contributions to society, it could go a long way to reduce stigma in broader society if some of the big names in tech who have mental health struggles went public with them.

Entrepreneurs are often brilliant, gifted people, Freeman said. But since many of them struggle with mental health, “You just need to put in a safety net here and there, you just need to prevent the dark side from taking over.”

In the months leading up to his death, Heinz could turn on the charm, but anxiety and depression crippled him. Adrienne believes that the system failed Heinz — that with better resources and support, her brother’s death might have been prevented.

“He had a personality structure that made it difficult for him to connect with people on a deeper level and garner the social support he needed to survive the storm of creating a startup,” she said.

In November, Heinz had to deal with some negative press. At a tech conference, he and another male scientist mis-characterized Sweet Peach, a probiotic product for women in which Heinz had invested. They incorrectly suggested it could make vaginas smell like peaches, which was not its purpose. Media pounced, calling it a manifestation of the sexist tech culture. Heinz worried it would affect his ability to raise more money.

Fear of failure

Heinz’s family and a few close friends knew he was not well. They showered him with love. His sisters wrote him letters of encouragement: “Life is waiting for you. You might be stuck here for a while but the world isn’t going anywhere. Hang on in there if you can. Life is always worth it.”

But Heinz continued to struggle.

“He was paralyzed by his anxiety and fear of failure. He was obsessed with the competition and felt rejection so intensely... All he could see was, ‘I’ve got to raise more money … I’ve got to hire the right person,’” Adrienne said.

He stopped sleeping and wouldn’t eat. When he was hospitalized in April, his roommate had severe hallucinations and rammed his head against the wall.

“The experience was just not therapeutic,” she said. “Austen was probably the healthiest person in the facility.”

The day before Heinz died, he checked into San Francisco General Hospital for weakness in one of his legs — possibly related to work stress. Doctors who questioned him said he had no signs of depression and indicated no intention of hurting himself. Adrienne believes he was too shaken by his experience the previous month to let on.

Though Heinz was eccentric, she thinks he was more like other founders than different. She hopes to see the startup community take action, raising awareness and building more resources for founders.

“Even when folks have incredible struggles to overcome, they’re capable of incredible things,” said Adrienne, who will walk in an upcoming Out of the Darkness Walk in San Francisco, held by the American Foundation for Suicide Prevention, in Heinz’s memory. “I would just encourage people to think about what we can do to foster a culture that allows us to thrive rather than suffer like Austen did.”
