General Meeting Notes - March 26th
By Jerry Thompson, Board President

Our March General Meeting started with refreshments & social time. At 7:00 Jerry Thompson called the meeting to order. He briefly described NAMI San Mateo and some of the services they provide to the community. Steve Robison, current NAMI board co-president, led the election of NAMI Board of directors officers.

Following the official NAMI business Jerry introduced our speaker for the evening; Dr. Jong Yoon. Dr. Yoon is a clinician and researcher from Stanford Hospital with extensive experience in psychosis and schizophrenia. He gave us an extensive presentation that supports the concept of mental illness being a disease of the brain. Following his presentation he had a “question and answer” session with a lively discussion on how the treatment of mental health conditions is evolving. It is exciting to hear from a clinician at the forefront of change!

Be sure to be at the next general meeting. When you are not here, you miss a lot!

How Do You Make Real Changes in Your Life?

Speak to people who have made real changes in their lives and they'll tell you how difficult it was but how much happier they feel as a result of those changes. Research reveals that long-lasting change is most likely when it’s self-motivated and rooted in positive thinking. But still, why does it have to take so long?

That's because change is a process and not an event. It doesn't happen instantly. Let's take a look at the 5 stages of change:

1. Precontemplation: You have no conscious intention of making a change at this point, but you have an awareness of the issue involved. To get past this stage, you have to realize that the unhealthy behavior is negatively affecting your personal goals.

2. Contemplation: You realize the behavior is a problem in your life and you're thinking about taking action to deal with it. At this point, you haven't made any commitment to change. Making a list of the pros and cons of changing your behavior can move you onto the next step.

3. Preparation: You now know that change is important to you and you begin to prepare yourself and put together a plan to make that change.

4. Action: You've made the change and you've begun to experience challenges without reverting back to the old behavior. You're employing positive coping skills to deal with those challenges. To make that change stick, it's important to be clear about your motivation for changing (Write it down, if necessary. Engage in self-talk, get support.).

5. Maintenance: Once the new behavior is part of your routine for six months, you need to maintain it. You work to prevent relapse and to integrate the change into who you are. That may require other changes, especially avoiding situations or triggers associated with the old habit. It can be tough, especially if it means steering clear of certain activities or friends while you work to fully assimilate your new, healthier habit.

The most difficult part of making real change in your life is getting discouraged along the way. As you embark on your journey, keep things in perspective. Real change doesn't happen in a linear fashion. There may be bumps along the way. Keep your goal in mind and remember: The fact that you are even trying is progress. Think about how far you've come from stage 1.

Medicare Physician Payment Bill Includes Two Mental Health Provisions

On March 30, the U.S. Senate passed HR 4302, the Medicare Sustainable Growth Rate (SGR) extension. The bill passed the U.S. House of Representatives last week and now goes to President Obama for his signature. HR 4302 includes two provisions that are relevant to people living with mental illness and their families.

First, the bill includes the Excellence in Mental Health Act demonstration project. This eight (8) state pilot is critical to modernizing publicly funded mental health services to align with evidence-based practices and to streamline Medicaid funding. The eight states selected will receive planning grants and Medicaid funding to provide comprehensive community-based mental health services and supports, including integrated mental health and primary care treatment. Community mental health programs participating in this program will be required to provide a broad range of services, including 24-hour mobile crisis teams, crisis stabilization services, outpatient mental health and substance use services, peer and family supports, and intensive, community-based services for veterans.

Second, HR 4302 includes authority for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to undertake a new pilot program for states to establish and expand "Assisted Outpatient Treatment" (AOT) programs. This program applies to individuals living with serious mental illness who are not participating in treatment and experience serious adverse consequences such as repeated hospitalizations, homelessness or incarceration. States that choose to apply for funding appropriated for this program will be required to gather outcomes data on the effectiveness of the program, including its impact on reducing negative outcomes.

Throughout history, we have had mental illness with us. It is 2064. We try to explain to our children and grand children what it was like 50 years ago dealing with mental illness. It was a painful period for all those who had a mentally ill loved one in their families. We refer back to those times and before as the Dark Ages of mental illness.

In every society. In every land. In every century. Being mentally ill loved one in their families. We refer back to those times and before as the Dark Ages of mental illness. Newspapers were filled with stories about the mentally ill – many who had sought help from an underfunded, wallets and created legis-lative and financial support. It was challenging to raise funds to support the many small, underfunded organizations whose purpose was to provide educa-tion and help to the mentally ill community.

It is 2004. We try to explain to our children and grand children what it was like 50 years ago dealing with mental illness. It was a painful period for all those who had a mentally ill loved one in their families. We refer back to those times and before as the Dark Ages of mental illness. Throughout history, we have had mental illness with us. In every society. In every land. In every century. Being “crazy” or “insane” were common descriptions of persons with mental illness. They were the freaks in society. They were burned at the stake. They were placed in shackles and racks in the public square. They incarcerated them in mental institutions where they were left to rot. Or they stuck them in medieval-type prisons where there was no hope. Even back at the turn of this century, the mentally ill were crammed into jails where they received no consideration or treatment and worse, were often brutally mistreated.

In 2014, our mentally ill continued to be in desperate need of help, many too far gone to know they were mentally ill – alone, forgotten and homeless. The for-tunate few who were being treated were able to sur-vive and tended to live close to and sometimes pro-ductive, normal lives. Even high-functioning (as men-tally ill persons on medication were called) individu-als would abandon their treatment and disappear from time to time. They often tried to survive without their medication – drugs which, for some, had serious and some times undesirable side effects. Those who had the insight that they had made the wrong decision, came home. But many did not.

Through the latter part of the last century and during the first decade of the 21st century, we made what ap-peared to be great strides in understanding and identi-fying mental disorders, such as depression, bipolar disorder, schizophre-nia, and borderline personality disorder. However, even with the advancement in our understanding of these mental illnesses combined with the incredible advancements in drug therapies, psy-chotherapies and nutritional support, there was still no cure.

More importantly, treatment was difficult to adminis-ter to the sick, if not impossible, and while appropri-ately applied medication was the most common pre-scription to restore the mentally ill to a functioning level, many families – and individuals – avoided be-ing diagnosed as “mentally ill” for the stigma was so great.

In these dark times, the stigma – which was prevalent throughout all societies -- prevented many from com-ing forward, especially in our ethnic communities. They hid in the family closet -- a back-room secret, many for a lifetime. Or worse, the mentally ill wan-dered aimlessly through our cities, sleeping on the streets, never getting help, treated like criminals or caged like animals.

Fifty years ago, we were “upside down” -- our health system was actually reducing facilities and programs to serve the mentally ill – not expanding to meet the needs. Drug therapies were expensive. Mental illness was not a very popular “disease of the month” like multiple scleroses, muscular dystrophy, cancer, or heart disease that opened fat wallets and created legis-lative and financial support. It was challenging to raise funds to support the many small, underfunded organizations whose purpose was to provide educa-tion and help to the mentally ill community.

In 2012, one of Los Angeles’s most prominent medi-cal centers – Cedars-Sinai Hospital -- actually closed down the best facility in the city (54 beds and a top-notch psychiatric staff) because they wanted to focus their “core services” elsewhere: Treating the mentally ill was one of the hospital’s least financially justifica-ble departments.

In the early part of this century, our police and teach-ers were mostly insufficiently educated, ill equipped and unaware of the mentally ill in their midst, even though a high per-cent-age of all those arrested were suffering from some mental illness. Newspapers were filled with stories about the men-tally ill – many who had sought help from an underfunded, non-responsive system. Nationwide, approximately 50% of jailed inmates in prisons are afflicted with some mental health disorder.

Social and medical remedies had not caught up to the enormity of need even with the abundance of evi-dence that found one in four families had someone who was mentally ill. Mass murders committed by mentally ill individuals had become common, every-day news 50 years ago. Everyone put the blame on gun violence, giving little attention to the mentally ill perpetrators who pulled the trigger.

One teenager -- whose mother had attempted unsuccessfully to get him help -- first murdered her, then went on a rampage at Sandy Hook Elementary school in Connecticut in 2012 where he killed 20 school children who were but five- and six-years old, seven teachers, and then himself. This tragic event traumatized Americans and shocked the world -- for a time. Beyond sensational headlines throughout the country, little else was done. Television coverage and newspapers continued to be filled with demands for gun control -- but little attention was paid to the unmet need for treatment for the mentally ill. And so it went.

The attempts to deal with the terrible tragedy of mental illness in each of our communities were fee-ble at best. In the mid-1980s, the federal government chose to get out of the mental health business and closed many facilities because mental illness was so unpopular. There was little if no funding at the state level and facilities were meager and far between. Funding was invested instead in our gar-gantuan correctional system -- jails and prisons that warehoused and abused our mentally ill popula-tion. Back then, that was society’s “answer” to dealing with this tragic disease.

Gradually, we came to realize that this crisis of the mentally ill could not be ignored.

America, we have a problem

It is now 2064, some 50 years since the Dark Ages of Mental Illness. We have begun to turn our world around in helping the mentally ill and their families. We have witnessed a society that has fin-ally accepted that “America, we have a problem.” And that problem was our lack of response to men-tal illness.

Resources at all levels began to flow into the communities and institutions who initiated new treat-ment programs. A law was finally implemented throughout the United States -- AOT (Assisted Out-patient Treatment), known in California as Laura's Law and in New York, as Kendra’s Law -- that gave society the ability to treat the mentally ill with early intervention while safeguarding their human rights -- a law that protects us all.

We saw increased funding for educating law enforcement on how to safely interact with mentally ill persons on the street. Teachers and parents were given ‘early-warning’ training on how to identify young students who were candidates for serious mental illness in the future. Advanced medical re-search produced drug treatments that could get to the root cause of mental illness with few and managea-ble side effects, and provide a secured future for us-ers. And medical research also was on the path to discovering the genes in our DNA that could possi-bly be predictors to future mental illness.

And there were proven, non-drug treatments as well that resulted in positive outcomes and enabled those who did not want drugs to overcome their illnesses.

Volunteer groups, such as the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) expanded into every major community in the country -- conducting in-the-trench training and education programs for families, their loved ones and others in their communities.

It is now 2064, and the mentally ill are still with us. It is ironic that we have actually increased the num bers reported in the last 50 years, because we have lifted -- for the most part -- the severe public stigma of mental illness. We have better, more-accurate as-sessments of those afflicted with mental illness in our communities. The lost, the forgotten, the home-less, the less fortunate continue to come forward, out of the dark shadows, because they are seeing hope for themselves.

But what about those who have not come in from the cold? They stay inside. They sit in closets, afraid to come out, hiding their sickness. They believe they are not sick. Their families -- who know better -- still try to get needed treatment for them. With society’s better understanding of mental illness, combined with the advancement of more humane practices and attitudes, we are able today to coax them into getting help for themselves.

The good news is that no longer are we huddled together in fear of the consequences of our loved ones who face life and death every day. Mental illness is no longer stigmatized like it used to be. It is out in the open. And the mentally ill are getting treated.

Is there a cure? Not as of 2064 -- the mysteries of the mind continue to challenge our best, but they predict that by the end of this century, we’ll have one. For the most part, the Dark Ages are behind us.

I hope so.

The National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI) issued the following statement by NAMI Executive Director Mary Giliberti in response to the announcement by the U.S. Department of Health & Human Services (HHS) that it will not move forward to “finalize” proposed rule changes under Medicare Part D that would have restricted access to antidepressant and antipsychotic medications:

"Less than one full working day since the official comment period on the proposed rule ended and one day before the House of Representatives is set to vote on a bill to block the proposed changes, HHS's Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) has indicated that it has heard the concerns of people living with mental illness and others over the elimination of three protected drug classifications under Medicare Part D.

"In a letter to members of Congress, CMS has recognized 'the complexities of these issues and stakeholder input' and declared that it 'does not plan to finalize the proposal at this time.' The agency has promised not to advance 'some or all of the changes' in the future without first receiving additional stakeholder input.'

"For now, for people living with mental illness the crisis has been averted. The threat of restricted access has essentially been stopped—although we will continue to support the pending legislation currently scheduled for a vote on Tuesday, March 11, if House leaders decide to complete that process.

"We thank CMS for responding to the concerns of individuals and families affected by mental illness and both thank and congratulate the thousands of individuals who responded to NAMI's call by submitting official comments or signing NAMI's online petition in opposition to the proposed rule. NAMI will of course continue working to protect access to necessary medications in all health care programs, whether today or in the future."

April 1, 2014 - The Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law has released a report on the ADA and integrated housing opportunities for people with mental illness: A Place of My Own: How The ADA Is Creating Integrated Housing Opportunities For People With Mental Illnesses.

A Place of My Own is designed to provide guidance and thoughtful leadership to nationwide stakeholders about how the ADA has been and can be used in the future to create supported housing for individuals with mental illnesses who are needlessly institutionalized or at risk of needless institutionalization.

The report describes what the ADA's integration mandate and the Supreme Court's Olmstead decision require, how they have promoted the development of supported housing for individuals with mental illnesses, what supported housing should look like, and how investment in supported housing will help states comply with their legal obligation to administer services to individuals with disabilities in the most integrated setting appropriate to their needs.

The report is available to download on the Bazelon Center's website: www.bazelon.org/portals/0/Where We Stand/Community Integration/Olmstead/A Place of My Own. Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law.pdf
