7 Qualities Most Desired in a Therapist

Nancy Morgan, PhD.

Dr. Morgan has been capturing client responses to the 7 Qualities Most Desired in a Therapist for over 10 years, and has used clients’ responses to train young therapists how to cultivate those qualities within themselves. She has presented locally and in Oregon at conferences for therapists and psychologists, and this summer conducted further research on the subject. She states, “Our clients are our best teachers.”

Dr. Morgan is the Director of Behavioral Health at LifeMoves (formerly InnVision Shelter Network).

NAMISan MateoCounty General Meetings are free and open to the public. We welcome all who support our mission to improve the quality of life for people with mental illnesses and their families.

Thanksgiving General Meeting

On November 16, NAMI members, friends and family gathered to celebrate Thanksgiving the NAMI SMC way, with music and inspirational stories—and lots of pie! Setting the tone was Frances Ancheta-Becker, a singer/songwriter and acoustic guitar player who performed a variety of musical styles. Frances is the Recreational Therapist at the in-patient unit at the San Mateo Medical Center. Her playing got the crowd singing along with her!

First to speak was Joni Marshburn Jamin, living well in recovery. She is a frequent speaker for NAMI’s In Our Own Voice program. She told of how much she had managed to accomplish despite a serious case of Bipolar I. Though she has been hospitalized over 15 times in 25 years, she has achieved everything she set her mind to, including two college degrees. The trick is to go slow and keep plugging away. She thanked her family for sticking by her no matter what, always believing that she would come back stronger from every episode, and giving her the help and freedom to achieve a life worth living. She was also thankful to NAMI SMC for the opportunity to become an advocate: it has changed something that might cause embarrassment into a source of pride. She has dreamed of traveling, and she has!—with her parents’ blessing. A world tour went well, until it did not. Joni tells a poignant life story, with humor and lessons for us all.

Detective Jim Coffman told three stories of families struggling with mental illness and the help and interaction provided by our public servants. One story was that of a sister who worked for four months with local police to help her bipolar brother get treatment. She went right to the top—Steve Kaplan (San Mateo County Behavioral Health Chief)—and enlisted his help. It worked, leading to the point: keep trying and go to the top for help! Most helpful is to have a written history on hand to provide to law enforcement (see namisanmateo.org/support/legal-resources/...AB 1424). Jim reminded the group that law enforcement officers are also a family facing danger and trauma daily. Ongoing trainings (CIT training) are designed to help officers better handle sensitive situations that arise when dealing with mentally ill persons. We are in this together and interacting all the better.

Reverend Ben Meyers, Unitarian Universalists of San Mateo, gave a very moving presentation. He led the group in an exercise of knowing and forgiving ourselves: we wrote a list of personal limitations, and on the reverse side, a list of what we want to give to the world. Then held the limitations list against our heart, and forgave these in ourselves and realized we can live well despite these perceptions. Next we held the list of what we want to give to the world over our hearts, and to feel this generous awareness. Powerful emotions arose. Rev. Meyers’ message was much-needed and well delivered—a great experience!

The meeting closed with the audience taking turns saying what they were thankful for. May we all continue to be grateful for each other throughout this holiday season and in the new year.

San Mateo Editorial: Yes on Measure K
Extending local funding for critical services & improving the quality of life in SMC—passed by voters on Nov. 8

When San Mateo County voters passed Measure A in 2012, it was sold as a way to help bridge a funding gap and to ensure that county services such as health care, human services, parks, public safety and other initiatives would not be cut. It was to also provide money to make sure that Seton Medical Center would stay afloat by allocating seismic upgrade money since it provides essential health care services to North County residents.

It was originally estimated to raise about $60 million a year through an increase of the local sales tax of half of 1 percent, though it now generates about $80 million a year. We opposed the measure at the time because it was too soon after the Great Recession and many San Mateo County residents were still feeling the economic effects. This was the same year that saw the state pass Proposition 30, a quarter-cent sales tax increase to raise $6 billion a year for schools. There were many needs across the state and its citizens were still getting their economic bearings while the local measure had a number of loosely defined beneficiaries.

So now four years later, county voters are being asked to extend what was to be a temporary tax set to expire in 2023 for another 20 years. One might think that our reaction would be more along the lines of what we said four years ago. Many of the same issues still hold true. Yet there are very important differences with this proposal, now known as Measure K. The county has had four years to prove it could spend Measure A money wisely. That money has gone to a host of worthwhile programs such as the Big Lift, which provides resources for early education, and also homeless and drug rehabilitation programs along with other basic necessities in the county. And while the economy has definitely turned around, it has left many struggling. The booming nature of this recent cycle has meant there is an exponentially growing need for housing assistance programs.

This county has a long history of planning for affordable housing developments but the recent need has outgrown the effort considerably. And that is where Measure K comes in. The 20-year extension assists the county in its borrowing capability of up to about $200 million to be used for a number of affordable housing developments. That money could be combined with other money from cities, the Housing Endowment and Regional Trust and nonprofits to provide new opportunities for housing at levels that can be afforded by average San Mateo County residents. The money can also be used to expand code enforcement efforts to ensure aging buildings won’t need all tenants evicted for massive upgrades and even assistance for property owners looking to make upgrades without needing to vacate much-needed units and disrupting communities. Older buildings could also be purchased through additional partnerships as a way to keep tenants in place rather than being sold to those looking to rehabilitate and flip swaths of units. The county is also considering an ordinance Oct. 4 that would create a relocation assistance program for tenants evicted from illegal or substandard units. There is much promise in these proposals and it has taken an acute crisis to put nearly every elected official in this county on point when it comes to finding palatable solutions. Even if rents stabilize or go down, the expense of housing will still be high in this area and will likely grow in the future as it has in the recent past.

This crisis is not just born of new jobs. It also comes at the edge of the dissolution of redevelopment agencies which had allowed for partnerships to create affordable housing developments sprinkled throughout the Peninsula. Federal funding that had often allowed city governments to create programs for people to buy homes and stay in them has all but dried up. Low interest rates means new offices and high-rent housing pencil out but developments with an affordable component don’t as easily. And legal questions about inclusionary zoning, which set aside a percentage of new housing developments for below-market rate units, remain.

It is a perfect storm, and out of it comes ideas that can be part of a solution.

Latchng affordable housing onto an existing sales tax and providing an extension is not a perfect vehicle, as opponents to this measure rightly point out. County officials had entertained the idea of floating a bond to voters but there wasn’t enough time for polling and outreach, and this situation needs attention sooner rather than later.

Measure K provides an opportunity for county residents to redirect county revenue into affordable housing while allowing county officials more flexibility in financing needed projects sooner rather than later. It is unfortunate we are in this situation in which government money — our money — is needed to ensure our county stays economically diverse and livable. But we are. Measure K will help provide housing to those who need it. It will help alleviate traffic because workers can remain here rather than commuting. But most importantly, it provides hope for many who are being priced out of this area and will help retain our community as it is — with room for all income levels.

Will Section 529A ABLE Accounts Replace The Need For Disabled Beneficiary Special Needs Trusts?

Planning for special needs beneficiaries is highly complex, a mixture of making challenging care decisions and managing limited resources. Many families will try to save assets on behalf of a special needs beneficiary to provide further support, but if not coordinated properly, can actually disqualify the beneficiary from Federal and state aid programs, including SSI and Medicaid.

The primary solution—establishing a (3rd-party) supplemental special needs trust—can help preserve the beneficiary’s eligibility for aid programs, but itself has a non-trivial cost to create and maintain, in terms of both legal fees, administrative expenses, and potentially unfavorable tax treatment.

To help ease the challenge for families with special needs children, the recently passed “tax extenders” legislation at the end of 2014 created a new type of account for the supplemental needs of special needs (disabled) beneficiaries. Under the new IRC Section 529A, Qualified ABLE programs will allow families to accumulate funds for such beneficiaries, enjoy tax-free growth, and allow the assets to (mostly) avoid disqualifying the beneficiary from any state or Federal aid, but without the cost and hassle of creating a special needs trust.

Given the limitations of these new 529 ABLE accounts – from restrictions on the size of contributions, to a rather “unfavorable” Medicaid payback provision after the death of the disabled beneficiary – the new Section 529A plans will not likely replace all special needs trusts, but could be used effectively as a supplement to them, and may be an especially appealing alternative to trusts for “smaller” account balances under $100,000.

(From page 6)

An individual who is experiencing a major depressive disorder will experience five or more of the below symptoms for at least two weeks:
- Sleep pattern changes, including early morning wakening;
- Marked diminished pleasure in all, or nearly all, activities every day;
- Observable agitation or slowed movements;
- Feelings of worthlessness, self loathing or self-hatred;
- Excessive feelings of guilt;
- Suicidal ideation;
- Significant weight loss or gain in a month of 5% or more of body weight; and
- In children, increased irritability.

If you are worried you or a loved one might be clinically depressed, schedule an appointment with your primary care physician or a licensed mental health professional to talk about your concerns.

Situational/Stress-Related Symptoms

Situational stress can generate emotional or behavioral symptoms that look and feel very much like clinical depression. Depending on the degree of symptomatic discomfort, the treatment plan for situational or stress-related symptoms may be supportive or psychoeducational in nature and often includes the teaching of simple coping tools (find some below) that can help combat the impact of everyday stress. Remember that certain types of anxiety and sadness are often a normal response to difficult or overwhelming circumstances.

Here are some symptoms shared by situational stress and clinical depression:
- Feeling sad or hopeless;
- Tearfulness, frequent crying;
- Changes in appetite;
- Trouble sleeping;
- Increased worry and anxiety;
- Headaches and stomachaches;
- Low energy or fatigue;
- Withdrawal from loved ones or social activities previously enjoyed;
- Increased absence from work or school; and
- Trouble concentrating and making decisions.

Stress Management Toolkit

Long, slow, deep breathing is your first defense.

Anxiety can quickly build up into a fight-or-flight reaction, panic attack, hysterical crying or other uncomfortable feelings and symptoms. Long, slow, deep breathing can stop anxiety in its tracks because the body cannot be in danger—real or imagined—at the same time it performs this type of breathing. Long, slow, deep breathing signals to the brain that the danger has passed. Start by doing three or more long, slow, deep breaths. Put your shoulders back and try for full lung capacity. The inhale should be 3–4 seconds, while the exhale should be 6–8 seconds. Most people do this by breathing in through the nose, pausing, then slowly blowing out through the mouth, as if they had a tiny straw between their lips. Many people feel calmer after using this technique.

Progressive muscle relaxation works.

Although many people feel calmer after breathing this way, some do not. Fortunately, we have a technique to help 100% of people relax (including resistant teenagers). It’s progressive muscle relaxation (PMR). With this technique, you tighten various muscle groups, hold the tension for 3–5 seconds, then relax. I usually have people do each muscle group three times as they work their way around the body.

An online search will bring up many PMR scripts and videos. I have a video of me teaching PMR on my website called “How to Interrupt a Fight/Flight Reaction.” I always teach it to children; in fact, I encourage adults to teach it to the children in their lives:
- Pick up two lemons and squeeze them, tightening your biceps, triceps and pectoral chest muscles.
- Bring your shoulders up to your ears, pause, then drop them down.
- Pretend there’s a fly on your nose and that you can only get it off by squinting your face.
- Suck in your stomach as hard as you can, hold it, then let it go.
- Tighten up your buttocks and the backs of your thighs so that you’re sitting up higher in your seat, wait, then relax.
- Lift up your legs and tighten your quads and calves. Hold them up, then drop them down.
- Sit in a chair that comes to your mid-back. Hold your arms straight out in front of you. Now raise them up and lean backward as far as your chair can comfortably allow. Just hang there for a few seconds, looking at the wall behind you, upside down. Then come up.

Foster resilience with meditation to positively rewire your brain.

Short, simple mindfulness meditation techniques can rewire the brain to experience deeper feelings of happiness and peace. Rick Hanson, Ph.D. is a neuropsychologist and author of Hardwiring Happiness and Buddha’s Brain. He teaches about the neuroplasticity of the brain and the benefits of spending a few seconds to enjoy good experiences in our imagination, which he calls “taking in the good.” Adopting these practices over time can actually change your brain’s wiring in positive ways and help you to achieve a more balanced, relaxed outlook. (I also highly recommend taking a class such as yoga, tai chi or qi-gong to help ease stress, tension and negative emotions.)

There is no magic pill, and no single technique cures situational stress or clinical depression. When life gets stressful, you can achieve a more peaceful state of mind and experience a greater sense of calm with these techniques, which experts have successfully used for decades. You can also always take the first step and contact your doctor or licensed mental health professional today.
