

The kappa leaguers and I went to Charlotte, North Carolina for a very important conference. There were multiple guest speakers and we learned great morals from and they also inspired us to be young black men. The first presentation was about public safety and what ta do when a cop pulls you over. By learning what to do, we are able to know to be cautious and diligent and what to do in these types of situations. If we didn't learn about this, we can mostly be arrested or even wind up being dead.

The next guest speaker was the chairman of kappa league and he asked us if all of our GPA was higher than a 3.0, and we all raised our hands. He was so proud of us that we all are doing well in school and that we can make a difference in the world. It is all about mindset on how we try to accomplish certain objectives in this world. Another example is when we saw a glass of water that was half filled. I said to myself "the cup is half empty" and boy was I wrong. I was supposed to say it wa half filled. By saying this it gives a whole different meaning on how you view certain tasks.

By going to this Kappa league conference, I was able to learn what to do when a police pulls you over and how to have a positive mindset in certain tasks. Not only that, but us Kappa leaguers were able to bond like brothers because you need friends and family to get through life.
