Tibetan man dies after self-immolation; oppressive measures intensified in March 10 anniversary week

UPDATE: March 8, 2018

The brother of Tsekho, the Tibetan who set fire to himself and died on March 7, died after torture in prison following the crackdown a decade ago in March, 2008. Tsekho, who is from Namtsoma village in Me’uruma township in Ngaba, is from a family who have suffered deeply from oppressive policies in Ngaba. In 2008, his half-brother, Namtso monk Nying-la, was tortured in prison and released with critical injuries, according to two Kirti monks in exile in Dharamsala, India. He died a few months later. Another relative on his father’s side, Urgyen Gyatso, the Namtso monastery disciplinarian, was also arrested and imprisoned at that time. Tsekho joined Namtso monastery as a child, but later disrobed. The two Kirti monks, Kanyag Tsering and Lobsang Yeshe, said that no details of his wife and children were available.

A Tibetan man in his forties, Tsekho Tugchak, set fire to himself and died today (March 7) in Ngaba (Chinese: Aba), eastern Tibet, the first self-immolation in Tibet this year. It is the 153rd self-immolation in Tibet, and happens at a time of intense securitization across Tibet in the buildup to the sensitive anniversary of the March 10 Uprising in 1959, and the tenth anniversary of protests that swept across Tibet in 2008 on the same date.

Graphic images circulated online of Tsekho Tugchak’s blackened body, lying on the ground, his arms outstretched. He was from a nomadic village in Meeruma township in Ngaba Tibetan and Qiang Autonomous Prefecture, Sichuan, the Tibetan area of Amdo. The last Tibetan to set fire to himself, Konpe, was also from Ngaba, and set himself on fire on December 23, 2017, close to the area of the first self-immolation in Tibet in February, 2009.¹

Tsekho Tugchak set fire to himself at a time of intensified military presence across Tibet. In the buildup to the March 10 anniversary, there has been a series of intimidating military drills across the plateau and the presence of massed ranks of troops in riot gear at peaceful prayer festivals.

Just three days ago on March 4 (2018), the Chinese authorities underlined how their strategies to prevent self-immolations rely upon oppressive measures. At a meeting in Chamdo (Chinese: Changdu or Qamdo) in the Tibet Autonomous Region, officials heard that in order to “prevent self immolations”, it is necessary for Party officials to maintain tough repressive measures already in place, and also to ensure “their absolute loyalty to the CPC Central Committee with Comrade Xi Jinping as the core”.²

Matteo Mecacci, President of the International Campaign for Tibet, said: “Since the wave of self-immolations in Tibet began in Ngaba, Tsekho Tugchak’s home area, the Chinese authorities have responded by intensifying the military buildup and repression. While the whole area is under lockdown and all Tibetans who dare to share information with the outside world are at risk of imprisonment, the reasons of Tseko’s self-immolation are not yet known. It is unthinkable that China can continue to block all independent investigations and requests of access to Tibet and impose a regime of fear and repression. On March 7, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Zeid Ra’ad Al Hussein denounced once again the Chinese Government’s failure to respect the rights of the Tibetan people. It is high time to hold the Chinese Government accountable for all 153rd self-immolations that have taken place in Tibet since 2009.”

Heavy securitization in Tibet and the message from the Party on self-immolations

The presence of a senior Party official and massed ranks of troops at Kumbum monastery on March 2 (2018) at the same time as a prayer festival, the Monlam Chenmo, sent an uncompromising message on the Party’s tough line as the March 10 anniversary approaches. It also underlined how in the current political climate, peaceful religious practice in Tibet is frequently conflated with threats to ‘national security’.

Wang Zhengsheng, head of the Public Security Bureau and Deputy Governor of Qinghai, chose the occasion of the prayer festival at Kumbum on March 2 to inspect troops, and “to study and instruct all aspects of security work and deployment” at the ancient Tibetan Buddhist monastery on March 2. The state media detailed Wang’s visit to the main square at Kumbum, making it clear that the purpose of the visit was not to admire the traditional butter sculpture but to view the “emergency deployment of police and soldiers on duty” as well as Party cadres, highlighting the Party’s “relentless struggle” in Tibet.

Also this week the Chinese state media released images of military drills in Lhasa, Nagchu (Chinese: Naqu) and Lhokha (Chinese: Shannan) in the Tibet Autonomous Region, a ritualized display this year held in three different areas that has become an annual routine in the buildup to March 10.

In Nagchu, Vice Executive Chair of the TAR Jiang Jie addressed troops in militaristic language, speaking about the need to “achieve decisive victory” in the war against “hostile elements”. Images posted on state media from the military exercises on March 4 showed massed ranks of troops and special forces, including the fire brigade, and armored vehicles.

Jiang Jie stressed the need for “absolute loyalty” to Xi Jinping, and for troops to abide by his instructions to “safeguard the ‘northern Gate’ of the Tibet Autonomous Region”. He said that troops based in Tibet must “resolutely fight the people’s war, and build a strong wall of steel to fight against separatism.”

Images of a ‘mobilization drill’ in Lhokha on March 1 were posted on Chinese state media on March 3 (2018), depicting ranks of senior commanders, Party officials, troops, armored vehicles, fire engines, personnel carriers, and armed patrol vehicles. The state media report stated that armed patrols were going to be conducted in “densely populated urban areas” following the meeting.

The ‘stability’ meeting in Chamdo this week, which highlighted the need for the Chinese authorities to prevent Tibetans setting themselves on fire, follows direct references to the wave of self-immolations across Tibet last year in Chamdo, and reveals how Party officials are instructed to regard these acts as those undertaken by “the enemy”. In the week of the buildup to March 10 in 2017, the Party Secretary of Chamdo City Norbu Dhondup stated that it was imperative to “knock down those who lead others to try to ‘become heroes’; and target those who come to be self-immolators, terrorists, and extremists; destroy illegal organizations; and highlight the dignity of our legal and socialist system. We should start to use every power: A hunting dog’s sense of smell, a bat’s sense of hearing, and a falcon’s ability to seize, so that we can fight strongly via intelligence and the internet to know [the enemy] before they take any action.”

The language used in the state media indicates the more systematic approach of the CCP’s surveillance networks – in which even moderate and reasoned critique or expressions of cultural or religious identity can be characterized as the ‘enemy’ other, and as ‘splitsitst’ and criminal.

Since protests spread across Tibet a decade ago this week, the CCP has shifted from responding to incidents of protest and dissent, to new pre-emptive, more comprehensive steps of hyper-securitization involving thousands of Party cadres operating at a grass roots village level and more intensive ‘patriotic education’.
