As Michael Henry retires, the longtime Denver ethics leader has some parting words for a government with gaps

So let’s list his achievements.

Michael Henry’s service, which is not widely known, but is a quietly legendary part of Denver’s history.

Henry was the founder of the Ethics Board, which was created in 1990. He served as its executive director for more than 30 years, until he stepped down last year.

Michael Henry’s selfless work for the good of the community has earned him the respect and admiration of his colleagues and the people he has worked with over the years.

Henry’s achievements are not just about the rules he helped to create, but also about the way he enforced them. He was known for his fairness, but also for his insistence on holding everyone accountable, no matter their status or position.

Henry’s influence is still felt today, as the Ethics Board he helped to create continues to shape the way government is conducted in Denver. His legacy will be remembered for years to come.

Henry is not a politician, but he has a message for our political leaders. He said:

“Government is not an end in itself. It is a means to an end. It is a tool for achieving a better society. The goal of government is not to make life perfect, but to make it better.”

Henry’s words are especially relevant today, as we face challenges that require the intervention of government. It is easy to become disillusioned with the political process, but Henry’s words remind us that government is a tool that can be used for good, if it is used properly.

Henry ends his message by saying:

“Let us remember that government is a tool, not an end. It is a means to an end. It is a tool for achieving a better society. The goal of government is not to make life perfect, but to make it better.”

Henry’s words are a powerful reminder of the importance of the work he did, and the legacy he leaves behind. His message is one that we should all heed, as we continue to work towards a better future for our community.
