In November and December of 2014, for example, Human Services decided to increase the payments to some states for providing health insurance to uninsured individuals. In the words of the agency’s chief, the decision was motivated by the fact that more people were seeking care, and the agency was concerned about being able to provide the care. The agency had already increased the payments earlier in the year, but the increase was not enough to meet the demand. The agency’s decision was seen as a way to ensure that people had access to care, even if they were uninsured. The agency also took steps to ensure that the new payments were used effectively, including by requiring states to report on how the funds were being spent. The agency was concerned about the potential for fraud and abuse, and took steps to prevent it. Overall, the agency’s decision was seen as a way to ensure that people had access to care, even if they were uninsured.
