Teaching Philosophy

As a social work practice instructor, I have two primary objectives. (1) to provide students with the tools to translate theory into direct practice. (2) to integrate the art and science of social work into an experiential and embodied learning experience.

Teaching clinical social work practice, I believe, carries with it the responsibility to provide students with practical clinical tools and skills that they can take into their work. Social work theories need to be tested and grounded in direct practice while social work practice needs to be guided by theory. Theory without practice is sterile; practice without theory is blind. My teaching approach is guided by the goal of educating dynamic social work scholar-practitioners who can also interpret social work research and integrate neurobiology findings into their practice.

My philosophy is that social work practice is best taught through an experiential, relational, and reflective framework. The social work profession's emphasis on experiential learning is evident in its use of field education while the relational nature of social work learning is highlighted in the profession's core values and through the instructor/supervisor relationship. Implementing teaching structures where students apply concepts to their own experience enhances learning through the reflective process. Content is more likely to be integrated through a multi-sensory experience than simply through a cognitive exercise. As humans, we are neurobiologically wired to learn through relationships and in action. As an instructor, I aim to provide an embodied learning experience where students are engaged in personal reflection and experience course content in action. Rather than just talk about ideas and concepts, I want students to have a direct encounter with the material.

My background as a practitioner and trainer of trauma therapy, experiential therapy, sociometry, psychodrama, and group therapy highly inform my approach as a social work instructor. The mutual aid of one student teaching another become increasingly accessible through the application of sociometric processes and what Louis Cozolino calls an "attachment-based classroom". With proper warm-up, psychodramatic, sociodramatic, and other role-play techniques bring the course content to life. As an instructor, I work actively to balance educational content with the process of educating. Students are the future of the social work profession. I hope to help cultivate a generation of scholar-practitioners equipped with the personal values of self-awareness and integrity along with the professional skills necessary to work competently in the field.
