The MMUF Summer Research Training Program (SRTP) hosted at the University of Chicago prepares current Mellon Mays Undergraduate Fellows for graduate study and rigorous research. During the structured, approx. nine-week program, students in the SRTP complete courses in academic writing and social theory, are closely mentored by advanced graduate students and faculty, attend multiple workshops, and make presentations at the Chicago Research Symposium.

2021 DATES

DEADLINE: APRIL 1

ORIENTATION START: MAY 15 (TENTATIVE)

PROGRAM START: JUNE 14

FINAL RESEARCH PRESENTATIONS: AUGUST 12-15

PROGRAM END: AUGUST 15

COST: $500

Capacities and Experiences Cultivated

The program:

- deepens students’ critical and analytical capacities
- develops further students’ scholarly writing and presentation skills
- introduces students to methodology and research design relevant to their areas of study, preparing them to carry out independent research projects
- offers a distinct experience of cohort and community, inspired by the life and work of Benjamin E. Mays—alumnus of UChicago, mentor to many, scholar and lifelong civil & human rights activist
- pairs students with faculty and graduate student mentors, and develops students’ capacities in building strong and lasting mentoring relationships

Coursework & Workshops

Courses are taught by faculty and advanced graduate students supervised by faculty:

- Engaged Scholarship
- Writing for Research
- Preceptor-Led Research Proposal Seminar
- Weekly U.S. & Chicago Social Histories Workshop & Outings (see more below)
- Additional Workshops that explore: Applying Strategically to Graduate School; Health & Wellness; Creativity in Scholarship; the Social History of Diversity; and Ways of Being an Engaged Scholar.

The SRTP also offers a number of social gatherings, and sponsors outings to theater, dance, and music performance and to art and history museums and landmarks. Students to build a lasting community of scholarly and psychosocial support among their peers.

Course Descriptions

Engaged Scholarship: History, Culture, and the Construction of Race

In honor of the legacy of Benjamin Mays, this course examines the question of what it might mean to be an "engaged scholar." The goal of this course is to consider the ways academics can contribute to the development of an emancipatory politics through the production of socially and intellectually important scholarship. In order to accomplish this task, students survey writings by critical thinkers, considering the object and method of authors’ critiques as a means for developing their own. Where appropriate, students review the historical context of selected works, and consider their value in creating progressive social theory and practice.
Involving both lecture and directed discussion, this course is taught by a faculty member or post-doctoral fellow whose research interrogates concepts of 'culture,' 'society,' 'gender,' 'race,' and 'ethnicity'. Readings include examinations of peoples and countries from around the world. This course asks students from across the disciplines to think epistemologically and to examine the ways in which their own experiences (historical, social, cultural, class-located, gendered, and racialized) inform critical inquiry and influence scholarly questions.

Writing for Research: Constructing Problems
Kathryn Cochran, Associate Director of Writing Programs at the University of Chicago, teaches this course. Ms. Cochran brings to this course her experience in teaching professional and academic writing at the University of Chicago and to professionals in a wide variety of fields. Students meet twice a week, once in lecture (Thursdays), and once in a writing seminar (Tuesdays) led by a member of the Chicago Writing Program staff.

In the course, students analyze and write in the several modes important for moving from research to a working proposal: among them, summary, annotation, analysis, and the construction of a problem that can be addressed by the proposed research. They submit writing on a weekly basis. Workshop groups are small and are limited to 6-8 students.

Preceptor-Led Research Proposal Seminar
Student meet once a week for a 2-hour session with preceptors in small groups of anywhere from 4-8 students. The advanced graduate students serving as preceptors lead these small groups, while also working with each student individually in 1:1 office hours sessions. The preceptor group serves to guide and support students in the process of writing their research essays. It offers practical suggestions and also helps students come up with strategies when they get "stuck." Students complete weekly assignments that correlate with the writing that they are doing for the Writing for Research course and culminate in a research proposal (see “Chicago Research Symposium” below.)

Fellows are broken up into preceptor groups based on a combination of things—their research topics, themes and questions as well as their methodological approaches. When placing students, we take account of each student’s discipline or field of study (humanities, social sciences, etc.). Our goal is to build a small learning community among students working on similar projects. In the precept, students also learn the etiquette of peer critique and ways to provide constructive feedback of others’ work.
Social Research Methods
The Summer Institute in Social Research Methods provides students with immersive training in theoretically-grounded research methodologies through a combination of classroom instruction, skills-building workshops, and faculty mentorship. MMUF SRTP fellows who choose the SISRM option and are accepted will participate in a structured 11-week program that merges the SRTP academic program with SISRM coursework and methodological workshops.

Chicago Research Symposium
By the end of this program, students will have presented their research in a research symposium. By the end of the 9th week of the SRTP, students submit the abstract, critically annotated bibliography (minimum of 20 entries) and a revised research essay of 15-25 pages. This research essay is meant to serve as a "roadmap" for the research that students will carry out in the next year and as an agenda to guide them in working with their faculty mentors during the academic year.

The U.S. Social Histories Workshop
Organized and convened by Elise LaRose, Program Director and led by invited speakers, scholars, and community leaders, students move through historically informed tours of various communities in Chicago. During these outings, students discover the social and cultural histories of diverse ethnic communities and reflect on their efforts to achieve social justice. Along the way, we visit museums, vital cultural centers, historically significant landmarks and monuments, and end the day by sharing a meal with our workshop leader. This series aims to provide students with a cumulative experience that inspires them to reflect on the challenges, creative efforts, and rich pasts behind the present-day lives of many. Central to the community-building experience of Mellon Summer Training Program students, these workshops often prompt students to reconsider the histories of where they come from and those they study.
