All relationships, personal and in business are enhanced by using disciplined, rational, open-minded, informed thinking.

We're much more willing to challenge others' thinking, yet all too often afraid to challenge our own? Can we vacate familiar preconceptions we've always relied on in making vital decisions?

Do we believe in and trust those we lead and do business with, or are we afraid to see who they truly are and what they really think, especially of us?

Critical thinking faces and embraces fear of the unknown. It de-villainizes and befriends differences as it values the unique traits, talents, mindset/skillset of others – especially co-workers, prospects and clients. This is crucial to leadership success.

Extraordinary leaders use critical thinking to understand, not assume, the ideas and feelings of others without fear or judgement. They ask pertinent questions, without fear of the answers, to discover who they're interacting with.
